Last Will and Testament: Why You Need One

A person's last will and testament directs how his or her estate is to be divided – whether it all goes to the spouse, domestic partner, children or whether a portion of the estate goes to friends, educational institutions, or other charities. Without a will, the laws of succession or intestacy take over, and you will lose control of how you want your estate divided.

Estate Planning and Elder Care: Expertise Required

Leaving things to chance can cost much more than planning ahead. You need to understand your options and know your legal rights about advanced medical directives, trusts, guardianships, and powers of attorney.

Purchase and Sale of Homes: The Role of the Attorney

Your home is probably your biggest and best investment. When purchasing a home, you need an attorney to make sure the contract protects you to the fullest extent against all possible contingencies.
